

Khalkha Mongolian

The Khalkha dialect (Mongolian script: ᠬᠠᠯᠬᠠ ᠠᠶᠢᠯᠠᠭᠤ, Qalq-a ayalyu, Mongolian Cyrillic: Халх аялгуу, Khalkh ayalguu, [χaɮʁɑjɮ.ɡʊː]) is a dialect of central Mongolic widely spoken in Mongolia. According to some classifications, the Khalkha dialect includes Southern Mongolian varieties such as Shiliin gol, Ulaanchab and Sönid.^[3] As it was the basis for the Cyrillic orthography of Mongolian,^[4] it is de facto the national language of Mongolia.^[5] The name of the dialect is related to the name of the Khalkha Mongols and the Khalkha river.

There are certain differences between normative (standardised form of Khalkha) and spoken Khalkha. For example, the normative language uses proximal demonstratives based on the word stem ᠠᠨᠠᠨᠠ /n- (except for the nominative in [ᠠᠨ] and the accusative which takes the stem ᠠᠨᠠᠨᠠ /n-)^[6] and thus exhibits the same developmental tendency as exhibited by Oirat.^[7] On the other hand, the spoken language also makes use of paradigms that are based on the stems ᠠᠨᠠᠨᠠ /n- and ᠠᠨᠠᠨᠠ /n-.^[8] This seems to agree with the use in Chakhar Mongolian.^[9] The same holds for the distal demonstrative /tir/.^[10]

Khalkha may roughly be divided into Northern and Southern Khalkha, which would include Sönid etc. Both varieties share affricate depalatalization, namely, /tʃ/ > /ts/ and /tʃʰ/ > /tsʰ/ except before *i, while Southern Khalkha patterns with Chakhar and Ordos Mongolian in that it exhibits a dissimilating deaspiration, e.g. *tʰatʰa > /tatʰ/.^[11] However, Mongolian scholars more often hold that the border between Khalkha and Chakhar is the border between the Mongolian state and the Chakhar area of South Mongolia.^[12]

Especially in the speech of younger speakers, /p/ (or /w/) > [ɸ] may take place, as in Written Mongolian qabtasu > Sünid [Gaɸtʰä́s] ~ [Gaɸtʰä́s] 'cover (of a book)'.^[13]

One of the classifications of Khalkha dialect in Mongolia divides it into 3 subdialects: Central, Western and Eastern. The orthography of the Mongolian Cyrillic alphabet is essentially based on the Central Khalkha dialect. Among the main differences is the pronunciation of initial letter x in feminine words which is in Central Khalkha pronounced as it is written, in Western Khalkha as kh, and in Eastern Khalkha as g. Example: хөтөл (Central Khalkha), көтөл (Western Khalkha), гөтөл (Eastern Khalkha). The initial letter x is pronounced in masculine words in Western Khalkha dialect as h (almost not heard) if the second consonant is voiceless, and is pronounced as gh in Eastern Khalkha. Example: хүтга (Central Khalkha,) хүтга (Western Khalkha), гүтга (Eastern Khalkha). Initial т is pronounced in Eastern Khalkha dialect as d. Example: талх (Central Khalkha,) талк (Western Khalkha), далх (Eastern Khalkha).

Juha Janhunen - 'Mongolian' book - from 2012 - grouping of Khalkha dialects

In Juha Janhunen's book titled "Mongolian", he groups the Khalkha dialects into the following 19:^[14]

John Benjamins Publishing. pp. On page 9, Juhanen writes: "In Outer Mongolia, the Khalkha group comprises, apart from Khalkha proper, the Khotgoit (Xotgaid) and Darkhat (Darxed) dialects in the north and the Dariganga (Darygengg) dialect in the southeast. This group also includes the Tsongol (Tzonggel) and Sartul (Sartool) dialects, officially classified as "Buryat", on the Russian side. On the Inner Mongolian side, the Khalkha group comprises the so-called Ulan Tsab (Oulaan Tzab) dialects, including Chakhar (Tzaxer), Urat (Ourd), Darkhan (Darxen), Muumingan (Moo Minggen), Dörben Huuhet (Deurben Xuuxed) and Keshigten (Xeshegten), as well as the so-called Shilingol (Shiliin Gol) dialects, including Udzumuchin (Udzemcen), Khuuchit (Xooced), Abaga (Abegh), Abaganar (Abeghner) and Sunit (Seund). Most of the dialects genetically belonging to the Khalkha group but areally spoken on the Inner Mongolian side are in some ways transitional, in that they incorporate secondary influences from dialects of the Khorchin type. Khalkha proper itself is also dialectally diversified and comprises, among others, two major groups of subdialects known as Northern Khalkha and Southern Khalkha. The modern Ulan Bator dialect of Khalkha, which for political reasons has a prestige status in Mongolia, has also developed into a distinct form of speech.". ISBN 978-90-272-3820-7.
